Depicting pink-cheeked children who do everyday activities from picking apples to huddling under an umbrella, Hummel figurines are a timeless classic that brings joy to collectors around the world. The true value of the Hummel is the possession of a beautiful object that makes sense to you and your family. However, the rarity and demand for some models have attracted high prices online and at auction. How much does Hammel's figurines cost? Most Hummel figurines sell for $50-$75. But some rare, sophisticated Hummels can be sold for thousands of dollars at auction. The history of Hummel FigurinesIn the early 1930s, the art of Maria Innocentia Hummel's sister began to appear on postcards throughout Germany and Switzerland. These images of children in pastoral conditions caught the attention of Franz Gebel, director of the porcelain company W. Goebel Porzellanfabrik (now known as Goebel). In 1935 he negotiated cooperation with Sister Hammel and began to create figurines based on her drawings. Goebel debuted his new figurines at the Leipzig Fair and collectibles began to become popular. But, his success was interrupted by Nazi control in Europe.After the war, Goebel began to produce Hummel figurines again. The figurines became particularly popular among U.S. service members stationed in West Germany, who sent Hummels to family members back in the United States. These pink-cheeked figurines were the timeless collectibles ever sensed. General guidelines for the cost of Hummel figurines: Large and complex pieces: Larger, more complex pieces tend to be priced higher than smaller figures. For example, a piece with multiple children is usually worth more than a single child's figurine. Condition: Pieces in good condition without damage at the price of the highest. Also, if you have the original box and packaging, the cost will go up. Rarity: Retires and limited-edition figurines tend to be more valuable than the figures that are currently produced. Demand: There are figurines that every Hummel collector wants in their porcelain paddock. Some figurines like Jolly Wanderer (Hummel number 7) and Stormy Weather (Hummel number 71) had a lot of figurines created. But since these figurines resonate with so many people, these timeless classics are usually priced at a few hundred dollars. Other more expensive figures with high demand are less common, including the Ring Around Rosie (Hummel number 348) and Adventure Bound (Hummel number 347). Year: The older the model, the more valuable. Sometimes Hummels have an engraved number that indicates the year at the bottom of the shape. If this is not the case, you can specify the range of years of the official Goebel trademark. The brand has changed dramatically over the years. The most valuable Figurines of Hummel Other name of Hummel figurines has changed over time. Therefore, it is best to identify the figurines by the Hummel identification number. To find this number, gently flip upside down. You will find its imprint near the top rim of the porcelain figurine. You've probably seen a Hummel figurine on top of the fireplace of someone sweet kid reading a book, playing music, or going about their daily tasks. These porcelain figurines embody the simple beauty of the Bavarian countryside of the early 20th century. With their soothing pastel colors and adorable characters, the figurines have amassed millions of Hummel collectors to this day. While most Hummels go for $50, some are worth a few hundred dollars, and rare Hummels can sell up to 5-figure during auctions. If you have a Hummel figurine but you're not sure it's worth it, stay. It could be a hidden gem. The story of the Hummel figurine conceived by sister Maria Innocent Hummel - a prolific German artist and Franciscan nun - the first figurines were made by Franz Gebel in 1935. With the exception of a few short breaks during World War II and early 2000s, the figurines were in continuous production, breathing life into hundreds of drawings by M.I. Hammel. M.I. Hummel's Life and Figurine Conception, born in 1909 in Massing, Germany, Berta Hummel was inspired by her parents to develop her artistic talent. Speaking about her creative epiphany, her mother, Victoria Hummel, said: ... bouquet of beautiful flowers, pleasant baby face, beautiful mood, autumn forest. All these things could please her, and she would stand and watch and watch, for what seemed like an eternity. After graduating with honors from the State School of Applied Arts in Munich in 1931, joined the Franciscan sister Oussen, where she was given the name Maria Innocentia. It was in the monastery that Sister Hummel began to draw cute children with pink cheeks, performing daily tasks. The drawings represented her childhood in Bavaria - scenes of innocence and sincerity. In the early 1930s, Hummel's drawings were published as postcards by Munich publisher Ars Sacra. Soon they caught the eye of Franz Gebel - master of porcelain and owner of V. Gebel Porcellanfactory. Gebel decided to make Hammel's drawings porcelain figurines. After initial resistance, M.I. Hammel agreed, reserved the right to choose the official color palette and approve each figurine. After Hammel's death in 1946, this right was transferred to the Essen Sisters' Art Council, which continues to closely guard Hummel's philosophy and artistic style to this day. Franz Goebel and Figurine produced by Goebel produced the first Hummel figurines in 1935 and production continues to this day. Each of them goes through a long, painstaking process involving several artisan sculptors, mold masters and artists. Goebel carefully monitors the production process to ensure that the Hummel figurine, made in 2010, is exactly the same as the figurine made in 1950. Here is a quick overview of the process: First, a work by Maria Innocentia Hummel was selected for the new statuette. She was so prolific in her drawings that new figurines continued to be produced long after her death. The master sculptor then created a clay figurine from the drawing, spending weeks perfecting shapes, lines and features in an attempt to stay as close to hummel's work as possible. After the sculpture was approved, a master model was made. From the master, copies were produced, casting numerous pieces of figurines using liquid ceramics. Complex figurines are made of up to 40 separate parts, which are formed separately and connected later. After the figurines are collected, they are fired three times in the oven, glazed and fired again. The glazed blanks are subtly painted using a palette of more than 200 colors, all handpainted by Maria Innocentia Hummel back in the 1930s. The process of turning the drawing into a completed porcelain figurine could take months, and each step was approved by the Essen Sisters. With all the work that goes into making these figurines, it's no wonder they're so highly regarded. World War II - its influence, when the Nazi regime came to power, all religious schools, including the Oussen sisters, were closed. M.I. Hummel was personally attacked for her art. Hummel figurines were banned in Germany, and Goebel was forced to stop production. By then, Dr. Herbert Dubler and Ars Sacra had already founded a New York distribution company. Dubler brought to the U.S. a number of Hummel products from Germany - postcards, folders, and then figurines. In 1940 stopped sending products for Dubler for sale. Faced with huge demand, Dubler decided to create new products that closely followed the original art of M.I Hummel, but were designed and manufactured in New York. This is how Dubler's figurines were born. There may be more than 50 different figurines produced by Herbert Dubler Inc. These figurines are made of plaster material and usually have a copyright date, B. Hummel and either Herbert Dubler, Inc. or Ars Sacra incroated on the basis of figurines. Since Ars Sacra was the first company to publish the work of M.I. Hummel (original postcards) and her, many consider Dubler's figurines to be legitimate collectibles. But Herbert Dubler wasn't the only one who went after the market break left by Goebel during World War II. Beswick/English pieces As many as twelve different figurines exist with the back print of Beswick - England - a famous porcelain manufacturer. They are usually marked with mold numbers 903 to 914. However, when Beswick was later bought, no documents, forms or references to Hummel figurines were found. That's where the story ends. No one can prove who actually produced The Beswick figurines, but it's the magic of the collector's market. Speculation and mystery always carry a good price. Thus, today both Dubler's figurines and Besvik's figurines are in great demand by collectibles, although they are not authentic figurines of Hammel. How to identify authentic Hummel M.I. Hummel figurines in enticing designs made for many imitators, imitations, and pieces inspired by her drawings. In addition to works made during World War II, Asian producers flooded the market with copies and reproductions that cost much less. So how can you tell if you have an authentic Hummel or just a copycat? TMK Mark/Goebel Trademark The first thing you need to do is look for the Goebel trademark, also known as TMK, at the bottom of your Hummel figurine. Each figurine made by goebel is stamped with the company logo. Different logos have been used in different periods, making it easy to determine how old your Hummel is. Goebel first started with TMK-1 (the oldest) and moved all the way through TMK-8 (the newest). Suffice it to say that if you have a TMK-2 or TMK-3, your Hummel is older and worth more. As you can see in the picture above, it is easy to determine the shape and style of the bee and V characters. The full bee is usually depicted in older models, and the image pays homage to Hummel, whose name means bumblebee in German. Large figurines and those who have a base also received the signature of M.I. Hammel. NUMBERS HUM and other items Each figurine has the so-called Number Hummel or HUM. This is the 1 - 4 digit number that determines its model. For example, Adventure Bound #347. Figures produced in different sizes also have designs, appendages to HUM. These usually cast with a figurine or in soft porcelain, so they are a permanent identification function. Cross references to the HUM number online will easily tell you the name of the figurine and give you more information about it. Other markings you can find on authentic Hummel figurines are: Decorating developer - usually after HUM/room size and painted or stamped. Factory control number - A small 2-digit number of hand-painted or incusa is used to indicate who collected the Hummel figurine. Lower engraved number - used during periods to refer to things such as the year of production or the year of release. Sometimes it's just another factory management number. Signs of fake it is very easy to distinguish a fake from a genuine Hummel figurine if you place them side by side and know what to look for. In addition to holding the unique style and proportions of Maria Imocent's original drawings, as well as its TMK sign and identification symbols, be on the lookout for the following when trying to decipher if your Hummel is genuine or not: Features of fake figurines may have been missing, added, or displaced features. For example, the head is facing the other side, the facial expression is different, or there is no area of grass. If you can, compare your figurine with the proven original to make sure that their features are the same. The weight of the forge often weighs less than real Hummel figurines: Goebel uses a specific porcelain blend that makes the final product feel pretty solid. Copies often use cheaper materials such as chalk, plaster or even plastic. If your figurine is made of plastic, it's not a real Hummel. Colors Finally, the real Gobel made Hummels use a specific color palette determined by Maria Innocentia herself. Fake Hummels are usually painted in a similar way, but not quite the same, making it easy to detect reproduction. Look for any strange shades and shades on your figurine. If you can, links the colors of the tested Hummel. It doesn't have to be exactly the same figurines. The color palette can be recognized through authentic Hummel figurines. Hummel Figures Price Guide Most Hummel figurines cost $50-$75. Some models reach several hundred dollars. Special individual Hummel figurines can be sold for thousands or even tens of thousands of dollars. For a good starting point, link to this Hummel Figurine Guide, but note that prices can vary widely depending on certain factors. Factors that affect the age of value - Vintage Hummels tend to be more valuable. Age can be determined by the style of labeling TMK. Size and Complexity - Larger and more complex models tend to cost more. Condition - It is obvious that any damage, scratches, fading, etc. will reduce the value of the figurine. An untouched figurine in the original box can cost 10 times more than that Model without packaging. Rarity - Some Hummels have been manufactured for decades, others have been limited edition or special series. Obviously, the latter are more valuable. Demand - Some figurines are just simple popular than others like stormy weather #71 and Jolly Wanderer #7. The most valuable figurines of M.I. This is even more valuable with a porcelain identification plate that came with original figurines. Where to sell Hummel Figurines Once you are sure of the type, authenticity, and you have a stadium it's worth, it's time to make some cash. Here are the most popular ways you can sell your Hummel figurines: Auction houses A good way to eliminate the value of your Hummel figurine is to sell it at auction. Most auction companies organize collectible auctions advertised to networks of knowledgeable collectors and traders. There is a good chance to sell your prized Hummel figurines at a fair price, although you never know with auctions. If Hummel figurines are part of a property that you have inherited or should clean up, consider organizing an organization selling real estate. If advertised correctly, Hummel figurines can be the main selling point of the event and attract collectors who could buy other items as well. With the sale of real estate, you set the price so you can make sure that they will sell at fair market value. However, you have to be careful who evaluates your Collection of Hummel figurines. This is easy to overshadow one, as even minor details can dramatically change the price. Internet sites are of course the most obvious options to consider are popular online marketplaces like Craigslist and eBay. While these websites get millions of visitors every day, shoppers are often looking for cheap bargains and may not be collectors willing to pay what your figurine is worth. There are more specialized websites focusing on antiques and value collectibles like Ruby Lane. This site is popular with serious collectors and professional art and antiques dealers. While it gets less traffic, visitors are more focused and will probably treat your Hummel figurines appropriately. This Wrap Hope this article was a good introduction to the world of M.I.
